

SoMa - Multilingual Book Translator

In a small village nestled along the banks of the Niger River, young Amina loved books but struggled to understand them. Most were written in English, a language that danced just out of her full grasp. Her grandmother would sit by her side, translating the stories into Hausa, filling their evenings with laughter, wonder, and wisdom. But when her grandmother fell ill, the stories faded too.

That's why we built this translator app to ensure that no child, like Amina, is ever left staring at words they cannot truly feel. Our mission is simple yet profound: to break language barriers by translating books and learning materials into native African languages, both written and spoken. We want every girl and boy to read stories in the language that cradled their first lullabies.

Through this app, we give voices to stories and bring them home to every village, every mother tongue, and every eager heart ready to learn.
